The first year or so will be the hardest, due to the nature of the problems, the complexity of their scenarios, the uncertainties of projections, the need to re-evaluate the methodology in relation to the "best possible" approach by 2050, and all of the issues. But as we reported last year it's possible to get better estimates for the rest of the 30 years, or even beyond, via several different approaches that are not yet fully developed.. That's because climate researchers are already getting close to getting a global carbon dump on land to combat climate change. And as a result, an enormous variety of studies and conferences are coming together all over the world. They're all using an array of tools, including climate science, to examine potential methods for "deforestation and forest degradation" that could be implemented as soon as 2025 and "mitigate the risks of climate change from forest degradation in a time of reduced natural carbon supply" by a "high proportion"..
